

BOOK BRAINSTORMING PLANNER

Donna Price
Business & Marketing Strategist
Author, Speaker, Trainer, Facilitator

WELCOME!

TO WEEK 1 OF THE BOOK PUBLISHING BOOT CAMP!!

I am thrilled that you have decided to go on this journey. Writing a book and publishing it is an incredible experience.

As a business coach, I see it as a smart marketing strategy and business growth strategy. But there are lots of different reasons for writing a book and each has its benefits.

Over the next six weeks I will share with you the different things I have learned working with a publishing coach for the last five years, publishing several books of my own and helping others to write and publish theirs.

There are many ways to publish a book these days and you have to choose the right path for you. I will share with you why I have chosen to self-publish and why I think it is a smart choice for many authors. I will also share with you just HOW to accomplish self-publishing in a very professional and cost-effective way.

After we dive into writing and publishing we have to spend time talking about and planning the marketing side of your book!! And that is always fun.

So, let's get that book started!

I am looking forward to being on the journey with you!

Donna

GETTING STARTED....

Are you ready to finally write that book you've been thinking about? For many business owners, leaders, coaches and service providers, a book is the ideal marketing tool. It not only perfectly positions you as the expert you are, but it also allows you to reach a much wider audience than you likely could on your own.

Think about it, just adding your book to Amazon has the potential to put your name in front of millions of new viewers each and every month. You don't have to be a marketing genius to know that those kinds of numbers can have an amazing impact on your business, with...

- Increased traffic to your website (and more opt-ins, too)
- Critical "social proof" in the form of testimonials
- Instant "expert status" (the kind that's only afforded to authors)
- New interview requests and other opportunities
- More coaching clients

And all of that before you've even sold a single copy!

Now the only problem is, well, actually writing the book.

You've thought about it, maybe jotted down some notes, perhaps you've even outlined a couple of chapters.

But then, you stalled. Overwhelm set in, or you got busy, and now your book idea is stashed away on your hard drive collecting virtual dust. Or maybe you never even got that far. Maybe you found yourself so confused about the whole process that you didn't even start.

Here's what you need to know about writing a book: it's not as difficult or overwhelming as it seems, especially if you can break it down into manageable tasks.

STEP 1: WHAT'S YOUR BOOK-WRITING GOAL?

This is the step that every new author seems to skip, and it's probably the single most important decision you need to make! Without a book-writing goal, it will be extremely difficult for you to:

- Stay focused (you'll find your content wandering off-topic or you'll feel scattered)
- Stay motivated (you'll suddenly find lots and lots of things you'd rather do than write)
- Launch with authority (no great book launch starts with a fizzle)

Your goal can be personal ("because I want to be able to say 'I wrote a book!'",) or it can be all business ("because I want to give it to my clients at my next live event").

Maybe your goal is to land on the New York Times' bestseller list. Or you might want to use it as a lead generating tool. You may even simply want to make sales.

Not sure what your goal is? Here's how you can find out:

Do a little reconnaissance work among your competitors. Who has written a book? Chances are most of them have at least a book or two for sale on Kindle, if not on other platforms.

A quick peek will tell you what the goal was when the book was written.

Does it have a link (or several) to opt-in for a free gift? Is the book part of a series of small (30 pages or less) books? Is it frequently offered for free on Kindle?

If so, chances are this book is a lead generator.

Does the book sell for a relatively high price compared to others? Is it offered in print form as well as digital? Is it traditionally published through a company such as Random House or Penguin?

Books such as these are often used to improve market reach and brand recognition.

Finally, if the book is self-published but is available in print format, it may actually be a business card, designed to be given away at events.

So what's your book-writing goal?

Exercise: Brainstorm your book-writing goal.

What is the primary purpose you have for spending the time and energy it will take to complete this project? And don't be shy. No one will see this but you, so if your goal is to make sales or land on the bestsellers' list, say so!

STEP 2: REFINE YOUR MESSAGE

Now that you know why you're writing your book, it's time to decide exactly what your book will be about.

This isn't some high-level overview where you can say something like, "I want to write a book about branding." That's too general. For this step, you want to dig deep and clearly define your book's unique message.

Ask yourself:

- Who is my ideal reader? What is her life like? Why does she need this book?
- What's my area of expertise? What do I know that few others do? What unique insight can I provide?
- What's hot right now that ties into my message? How can I incorporate current happenings in my industry with my book?

One fantastic way to define your message and distill it down to its core elements is to write your back cover blurb. The combination of sales copy (you have to make it enticing enough to buy) with limited space forces you to include only the absolutely necessary information.

Not only that, but reading the back covers of books in your niche can give you important insight into:

- What other authors are writing about, and what their "slant" is.
- What your market finds appealing.
- Where the "holes" are in the available content.

Your back cover blurb should include who your book is for, why she needs to read it right now, and what she's going to learn. It should be no more than three or four paragraphs, and you'll probably find that's more difficult to do than you think, so take your time and write several drafts.

And remember, once you're happy with your back cover copy, keep it handy. You'll want to refer back to it if you lose focus while writing your book.

Exercise: Write the back cover blurb for your book.

STEP 3: YOUR STORY MATTERS

Want to know the biggest self-imposed roadblock authors face? It's that small voice in your head that says, "Who are you to think you can write a book?"

Sound familiar? We all have that voice, so it can (and should) be ignored...at least when it comes to getting the words on paper.

But that voice does bring up a great question: Who are you? And why should your ideal reader pay attention?

But here's the thing you must keep in mind: You have an important message that only you can share. We all do. It's your job as the author to uncover your unique story and write your book from that point of view.

Get this right, and you'll instantly and easily attract your perfect audience—those readers who "get" you and with whom your book will resonate. They'll become raving fans who will help spread your message far and wide.

But first you have to determine what your story is and why it matters.

Some examples of author story include:

- The weight-loss coach who turned her life around by losing 75 pounds and now provides encouragement and support to women who struggle with their weight.
- The business coach who struggled for years to get her own business off the ground, and who now has a unique ability to see past the roadblocks that hold her clients back.
- The small business owner who discovered a powerful marketing method that tripled her income, and who wants to help other business owners thrive.

Your story can be one of dramatic change, or an internal mindset shift, or even a very personal "why" behind your passion. Whatever it is, it's uniquely yours, and when you allow it to shine through in your book, you'll instantly set yourself apart from the competition to reach your ideal audience.

Exercise: Write your story.

A large, empty rectangular box with a thin red border, intended for writing a story.

STEP 4: RESEARCH

Ask any top-selling author and they'll tell you that the biggest part of writing is actually reading. You simply cannot hope to write a book that will appeal to your market unless you know what they're already reading—and why.

During the research phase of your book project, you're going to look specifically for the top sellers in your niche, plus the books your direct competitors have written (even if they never sold a single copy).

You'll want to pay attention to:

- Book length—does your market prefer lengthy, in-depth books or short reads suitable for an afternoon of study?
- Writing style—casual and fun loving or suit-and-tie-wearing formal?
- Platform—where do your ideal readers buy their books?

Beyond the basic though, you'll also want to dig deep to determine:

- Broad topics—where does the demand meet your skill set and interest? That's the topic for your book.
- Slant—what angles have already been covered?
- The holes—this is the most important part...what's missing from the available books in your industry?

Exercise: Find and read/review at least 10 books in your niche.

Title	Author	Notes

STEP 5: OUTLINE AND ORGANIZE YOUR CONTENT

There are two types of writers: those who plan and outline, and those who prefer to write “from the seat of their pants.”

While the loosey-goosey approach might sound appealing, for new authors it can be a fatal mistake. Without at least a rough idea what you’ll be writing about, it is easy to either lose momentum and not write anything at all, or (maybe worse) lose focus and meander through unrelated topics without a clear point.

The easiest way to avoid both of these book-killing scenarios is to outline and organize your material before you begin writing. You can do this with a number of different tools, depending on your personal preference:

- Software such as Scrivener
- Index cards or sticky notes
- A word or text document
- A physical notebook and pen

Whichever your choice of tools, it's important to outline your book so that it will make sense to your reader and so that it flows naturally from one subject to the next.

You may find as you're writing that your outline needs to be adjusted. That's perfectly fine. It's not carved in stone. But do resist the urge to expand your book beyond the boundaries of your original goal. If your reason for writing the book is as a lead generation tool, then continuing to add more and more information—no matter how good it might be—is a waste of effort. Instead, save that material for the next in the series.

An outline can help you avoid “scope creep” while at the same time answering that most difficult of questions, “What am I going to write next?”

Here's an easy way to start outlining: begin by noting all the “must have” sections:

- Introduction—if you can get a friend or colleague to write this section, do it!
- About you—why you're the perfect person to write this book
- Chapter 1—what the book is about in broad terms
- Conclusion—recap what your reader has learned and what she should do next

The chapters in between are where the meat of your content goes, and you can organize them in the way that makes the most sense for you and your readers, but do organize them. You'll be glad you did when procrastination and frustration strike.

Exercise: Outline your book.

STEP 6: GOAL-SETTING, DEADLINES & TIME MANAGEMENT FOR AUTHORS

It doesn't matter if you're writing a 20-page lead generator or a 350-page opus; the one thing you cannot afford to ignore is a writing schedule. If you think to yourself, "I'll write when I feel inspired" you will never finish your book.

Instead, take a tip from top authors and create a writing schedule. Make it goal-driven and unbreakable.

You know yourself best, so make it a point to schedule your writing time when you're feeling fresh and creative. Don't try to force yourself to write when you're tired or frustrated and all you want to do is sit down with a glass of wine and binge watch your favorite TV show. Instead, give your book the best of your creativity and energy, and you'll be much happier with the results.

Some writers find it helpful decide ahead of time how long the book will be, then break the overall length down into daily to-dos. For example, if you're planning to write 30,000 words and want to finish in a month, then you need to write 1,000 words per day. That may take one hour or it may take four, but you have to hit that daily word-count goal if you want to finish your book on time.

Other writers prefer to set a time-based schedule, and not worry so much about exactly when the book will be finished. With this type of schedule, you would—for example—create a writing appointment with yourself every day for two hours. During those two hours all you do is write.

You may get 2,000 words on paper, or you may only get 20, it all depends on how well the words flow on any particular day. But the point is to sit down and write. Here's a secret professional writers all know: your brain will learn that when it's 10am, it's time to write, and it will naturally kick into gear at the right time. So even if it feels like a struggle at first, stick with the plan. Writing will get easier the more you do it.

Exercise: Decide on your writing schedule.

	Mon	Tue	Wed	Thur	Fri
Word Count
Hours

STEP 7: DEALING WITH DISTRACTIONS, PROCRASTINATION, AND OTHER BOOK KILLERS

Along with scheduling time to write and planning out your deadlines, prolific authors know that a plan for dealing with distractions and procrastination can really help get more books published.

The fact is, life happens. Kids want your attention; the car needs a tune-up; clients or customers need you. All of these things and more will eat into your writing time if you're not aware of them—and actively working to prevent it from happening.

Procrastination is even worse. When you're writing a book and feeling just a tiny bit stuck, suddenly it seems much more important that you finish your laundry, brush the dog, or redesign your website than it is to sit down and write.

And when you combine the possibility of procrastination with a few of life's little distractions...well, you can see how it might take you several years to finally get that book written.

Here's how to prevent this from happening to your authorpreneurial dreams: work out a plan ahead of time.

Now obviously you can't plan for the unexpected disasters that sometimes pop up, but you can (and should) plan ahead for things like your kids and pets and clients/customers.

- Schedule play dates during writing time to keep the kids out of the house.
- Close your office door to prevent the dog from distracting you with her unmanageable fur.
- Post your business hours on your website and let clients know you will not be responding to email or phone calls except during office hours.
- Turn off your phone, email and Skype during writing time.
- Use a software program such as Scrivener that allows you to use a full-screen, distraction-free writing environment.
- Turn off your internet access during your writing time.

Procrastination is a little tougher to deal with, because it's all on you. The key is to know what's likely to trigger procrastination, and design ways to keep yourself motivated. Some ideas include:

- Rewarding yourself with a favorite treat or trip to the spa after a week of good writing (or even a day if you're particularly prone to procrastination)

- Enlist the help of an accountability partner to keep you on track.
- Make a commitment to do something unpleasant (such as making a donation to a political candidate you don't support) if you don't reach your weekly writing goals. Above all, beating procrastination takes practice. The more you do it successfully, the better you'll become.

Exercise: Brainstorm potential distractions and write a plan to deal with them.

Distraction	Plan

Exercise: Recognize when you're most likely to procrastinate and decide now how you'll resist the urge.

NEXT STEPS:

Complete each exercise, review it and refine it during the week. Here are the exercises for the week:

- Brainstorm your book writing goal
- Topic: write your story
- Back cover blurb
- Find and review 10 books in your niche
- Outline your book
- Decide on your deadline and your writing schedule
- Brainstorm potential distractions and solutions
- Identify ways you may procrastinate

Next week/session – 30 Day Book Writing Formula and Content Development Strategies

